Those who staid in the betting ring were forced out in the rain to see races run, and they were made miserable before the afternoon was over. Jockeys were soaked in the driving rain before they got to the post, and when they returned to the scales they were covered with a rich layer of chocolate-colored mud. None had comfort save the bookies, who sat upon their high stools and calmly raked in the public dollars. The card was well made up, and if the weather had been decent one of the best day's racing of the meeting would have been seen. There were many scratches, however, and none but the mudlarks went to the post.
